What is not required to implement the Treaty of Rome and apply to the United Kingdom The European Communities Act 1972 prohibits the United Kingdom parliament from enacting any law that increases the competency of the European Parliament or amends primary legislation, or repeals, amends or replaces any law which has been ammended by the Parliament (and not by any international or Community body). A law may be amended (and thus required to be implemented) if the law is re-enacted or re-enacted in substantially the same form as it previously existed (or would have previously existed had it not been amended). However, any amendment must be approved by the Parliament and the European Parliament (other than for existing laws which are already in force). A law may also be repealed if the law is replaced by a law in substantially the same form. However, the repeal of primary legislation is also prohibited and no law in force may be replaced by a law which has not been introduced. Other laws The European Communities Act specifically says: Prohibit any law to increase the competency of the European Parliament; Prohibit any law to amend or repeal any law which has been amended by the Parliament; Prohibit any law to repeal or amend any primary legislation other than that specifically authorized in the Act; Prohibit any law to repeal or amend any law which has been repealed or amended by the Parliament, except for a law which has already become law. Applications of the European Communities Act to the United Kingdom The European Communities Act (1972) applies to the UK. References Category:United Kingdom Acts of Parliament 19721.
